Parkinson's disease is a chronic disease that interferes with a person's ability to move, which means that they will have some difficulty controlling their body and walking. The exact cause of Parkinson's disease is unknown, but it is thought to be related to the death of dopamine-producing brain cells. According to the National Institutes of Health, this loss of cells is most likely the result of some type of chemical imbalance in the brain. Parkinson's disease is more prevalent in men than in women, because of the higher percentage of men in the United States. Symptoms The symptoms of Parkinson's disease usually begin to develop after age 60 and usually become noticeable at age 65 or older. People who have Parkinson's disease may have a stiff gait, tremors, poor balance, and problems with muscle coordination. In some cases, Parkinson's disease may cause slowness of movement. The symptoms of Parkinson's disease are usually a result of a decrease in the supply of dopamine to the brain. The brain is made up of dopamine-producing cells called "neurons." The loss of these cells, or neurons, would lead to problems with motor skills. The symptoms of Parkinson's disease may be either uniform, meaning they occur in nearly every area of the body, or non-uniform, meaning that one area of the body is affected more than another. Causes In the majority of cases, the exact cause of Parkinson's disease is unknown. Parkinson's disease has been classified into two main types: idiopathic Parkinson's disease and Parkinson's disease related to a neurodegenerative disorder. A person has idiopathic Parkinson's disease when it is unclear why the disease began. A person with Parkinson's disease related to a neurodegenerative disorder, such as Alzheimer's disease, dementia with Lewy bodies, or multiple system atrophy, has the disorder as a result of the neurons in the brain's basal ganglia area.
