Analysis of nanomaterial size and morphology using pyrolysis gas chromatography and gas-phase X-ray photoelectron spectroscopy. In this study, pyrolysis gas chromatography-photoionizationtime-of-flight mass spectrometry (Py-GC-PITOFMS) was used to obtain size and morphology information of inorganic nanoparticles (NPs) via the analysis of their volatile pyrolysis products. We are able to distinguish between semiconductor and metal NPs based on the presence of the characteristic mass peaks of In, Sn, or S. The analysis of SnO2 NPs revealed the presence of a mass corresponding to Sn, whereas the S containing NPs produced the characteristic mass peaks of both Sn and S in the spectra. Using this approach, the characterization of NPs in solution could be done directly without any sample preparation, but the use of NPs in aerosol was not as straightforward. To circumvent this issue, the aerosol was passed through a chamber containing a quartz plate where it was pyrolysed. The analysis of the pyrolysis products revealed that the aerosol contained primarily SnO2 and S-containing NPs with minimal SiO2 from the quartz plate. The deposition of the NPs onto the plate was confirmed by transmission electron microscopy.Razer Aerowolf + 11-Key Tournament Edition Keyboard Keyboards are a key component of a gaming setup.
