More particularly, the present invention relates to a diaphragm which improves the efficiency of the diaphragm, reduces the frequency of replacement and reduces the likelihood of rupture during use. The conventional diaphragm used in a compression start vehicle engine is made of a metal core covered by a latex rubber membrane, for example, as shown in U.S. Pat. No. 4,129,197. The diaphragm is typically made by a variety of methods including those described in U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,115,989; 4,249,431; 4,278,550; and 5,253,829. The use of the above type of diaphragm in a compression start engine poses several problems, one of which is durability. The rubber membrane of the conventional diaphragm is prone to damage, including rupture, which results in the loss of the diaphragm and a breakdown of the compression start engine. In this regard, a rupture is considered to occur when the diaphragm develops a weak spot which results in an area of the diaphragm material being torn or sliced from the diaphragm. The weaker areas of the diaphragm are referred to as "cracks". The more cracks formed in the diaphragm, the more likely it is that the diaphragm will fail and permit gas to escape from the compression start system. Another problem with conventional diaphragms is durability. As indicated above, a rubber membrane is prone to damage, including rupture, which is likely to result in the loss of the diaphragm and a breakdown of the compression start engine. It is, therefore, one object of the present invention to provide an improved diaphragm having a construction which resists damage, including rupture. It is a further object of the present invention to provide an improved diaphragm having a construction which is more
