An electrocardiogram algorithm for rapid triage of patients. Despite advances in technology, and increased efforts in cardiac auscultation, the rate of early identification of acute myocardial infarction remains low. We describe a modified electrocardiogram (ECG) algorithm that can be performed quickly, requires no knowledge of the patient's history, and can identify ECG changes consistent with acute myocardial infarction within 1 minute of the patient's arrival at the emergency department. A modification of current diagnostic criteria for acute myocardial infarction, the Q wave is defined as the mean voltage of two contiguous precordial leads in cases of ST-segment elevation and is defined as the mean voltage of the QRS complex in cases of ST-segment depression. The algorithm has been designed to support early triage of patients with chest pain by emergency medical services personnel, with appropriate secondary care provision. Legendary Weapons, warriors - 4Art | 2 A24 x 24 | SCROLL GALLERY | DISCUSSIONRSS LIKE in full: >A 'denial of service' attack did not disrupt Highways England's main computer systems, a Westminster select committee says - but has revealed that a second post-Grenfell site was hacked. It said it raised unanswered cyber security questions with the department, as it questioned how the website was not hacked last year in the wake of the Grenfell fire disaster. The attack on a borough-based department was perceived to be even larger than the panic buying at shops and supermarkets last August. That one was blamed by some on an online campaign that saw people buy up thousands of potatoes, which quickly sold out but at inflated prices. In a report on cross-government cyber security, the public accounts committee (PAC) said it was asked to give more detail on a "massive" denial of service (DDoS) attack on Highways England's systems on the day of the Grenfell fire last year. It said the attack was heard by staff at Highways England in London. But "in contrast to other significant attacks on Government systems in the past, there was no evidence Highways England was forced to shut down its operations". It said: "There is a discrepancy between the relatively minor information loss experienced during a rogue cyber attack on one part of Highways England's website in 2015, and the more serious cyber-security concerns raised by the impact of a similar attack in 2017." The government department's recent attack may have been conducted by an outside party, it said. Highways England's website was not shut down for more than 24 hours after the attack, unlike the Grenfell fire, or the wider internet service disruption in August. The PAC said it was critical of the issue as "there were deficiencies in the department's response to both events which put the public and the department at risk." It said: "We remain concerned that there have been substantial deficiencies in the Department's cyber security systems and this needs to be addressed urgently." A spokesperson for Highways England said the attack had not stopped
