A randomized prospective, open study was conducted in two groups of fifty patients each: one group received quinine sulphate (QS) tablets at a dose of 200 mg twice daily for a period of 18 weeks and the other group received a placebo. Serum vitamin B12 levels were significantly higher and serum folic acid was significantly lower in the group which received quinine sulphate than in the placebo group at 6, 12 and 18 weeks. The mean haemoglobin level of the QS group rose from 10.97 gm% to 11.62 gm% at the end of 18 weeks while the mean haemoglobin level of the placebo group rose from 10.87 gm% to 11.53 gm% during the same period. The haemoglobin level improved significantly in the QS group compared to the placebo group. Proliferation of erythrocytes in both the groups was also significantly higher in the QS group than in the placebo group. Side-effects, i.e., dryness of the mouth, nausea and vomiting were absent in the QS group whereas no untoward reaction was reported in the placebo group. The results suggest that QS is a good alternative for H. pylori eradication as it is safe and more economical.Neurogenic hypertension: relevance to the primary care physician. Hypertension is a major health problem today affecting about one-third of the population. There is an epidemic of hypertension due to the increased incidence of obesity and diet. Hypertension frequently occurs with visceral obesity and metabolic abnormalities such as insulin resistance and diabetes mellitus. Neurogenic hypertension is a disorder characterized by hypertension due to an increase in sympathetic nervous system activity. It has been demonstrated that pharmacological therapies on their own are not adequate to control blood pressure. Sympathetic nerve activity can be altered by denervation and pharmacologic interventions. The clinical implications of this neurogenic hypertension include hypertension unresponsive to the usual pharmacologic treatment of hypertension, failure of hypotensive medications to control blood pressure, and hypotension occurring in patients who are normally hypertensive. The management of this complication of hypertension requires an understanding of the path
