The reversible nature of covalent immobilization of glucose oxidase (GOx) onto polyaniline-polyvinyl alcohol (PA-PVA) composite films was evaluated. Composite films were obtained by polymerization of aniline in the presence of different concentrations of PVA. The prepared composite films were characterized by FTIR, X-ray diffraction and UV-vis spectroscopy. Characterization studies showed that the composite films were formed due to the condensation reaction between aniline and PVA. The optimum concentration of PVA (1%) was used to produce the composite film to maintain the surface activity of the enzyme. For bioactivity studies, GOx was immobilized onto polyaniline-polyvinyl alcohol composite film via cross-linkage. The optimum loading of enzyme for the formation of composite film was found to be 3 mg/cm(2) with 50% cross-linking of the composite film. The cross-linking rate was found to be dependent on the initial enzyme concentration and its content within the polymer matrix, as well as the volume of the bulk solution and the concentration of the cross-linking agent. It is noteworthy that, the released glucose oxidase upon rupture of the cross- bff6bb2d33

-2}. For the considered region of parameters we have used the following set of conditions which cover the whole domain of stability of the fcc structure. The pressure ρ_0 is fixed at $0.5k_{\text{F}}/\pi$. The interaction u_0 and the energy ϵ_0 are taken to be respectively equal to their values for the given density in the fcc phase. The Ginzburg parameter κ_d is used to describe the relative strength of impurity scattering as a function of the density, which is taken to be a smoothly decreasing function of the parameter x for the "mean" impurities $\rho = 0.25$. For a given density we find a set of values of x for which κ_d takes the required values. The values of x are found from the corresponding functional dependence $\kappa_d(x)$. Finally, to check the robustness of our results for the domain of stability we have replaced for example, the corresponding values for $\kappa_d(x)$ with different functions and found the same results.
