Community Gameplay - Featuring an in-depth, panel discussion about how the community could help in game development, and a chat about the idea of community-driven mods. In addition to what's covered in the regular Community Updates, this weeks update also has a new concept for the community-driven mod section of the website. As previously mentioned, the current community-driven mod section is a very small part of the whole, as there's only a few games out there that use mods. It was a massive undertaking to begin with, but also comes with a lot of problems. Not only does the mod section just exist as a small tab of the website, it doesn't even have any customisation options. The latest version, which is outdated, can be seen here. I think it's clear what kind of site we're aiming for. A site that promotes an environment that allows for player modding and subculture. But how can we go about this? How should we create this kind of environment for the community? As always, this is where the discussion comes in. We'll have a panel of community members to discuss the community in games. And after that, we'll get a chat about how we could implement a similar solution for Minecraft and other games. In the meantime, I'll be posting a few of the questions I have for our panel in the regular Community Updates, and since I'm a bit curious about how players experience community gaming in game communities, I'll be keeping an eye on the thread as well. The community for us is a very important part of the games we make. But as always, we'll be focusing our attention on a few major problems with the current community-based modding and modding in general. The first of which is a lack of visibility, and the second is a lack of communication and direction. We'll start off discussing the first issue, then take a look at the second in a short chat. Finally, we'll have a discussion about the idea of community-driven mods. So the next time you hear about a community-based mod or a community-driven mod, you'll be able to understand what we're talking about and maybe even understand the issue. We're all different, and we're all different in different ways. I myself don't have a lot of experience with modding, as I only have played one game in the past six years that allowed community modding. I'll try to cover the topic
