The program, which is being implemented in the Bronx, pairs students with peer mentors to improve safety and reduce the number of incidents among peers by identifying and connecting students most at risk. The DOE is now recommending that they scale back the program. These updates can feel exciting, or confusing and uncertain. Am I wrong? I was a big part of the pilot program and worked with the team on the grant. I'm not part of the recommendations to scale back the program, though I did receive the email when the DOE made their recommendation. What do I think about all this? A failed safety program Discipline as a Public Health Problem failed The program is a public health approach to addressing the high incidence of violence and bullying among students, especially among marginalized youth. The program pairs 11th and 12th grade students in schools with peers who are similar to them, so that peers can become knowers of each other, leading to less bullying and violence. Partners spend several sessions in each other's schools, going over the results of survey questions, looking at ways to positively influence each other, and developing safety plans. Peer mentors are then trained to maintain a relationship with their pairs to create a sense of support for them throughout the school year. What went wrong with the program? While the program was impressive, it was also promising, and the DOE received a $5 million grant in 2014 to implement the program. I was a mentor and a peer, and one of the other peer mentors at that time. The process worked. We all had powerful experiences that we gained from. But we didn't see an immediate impact on reducing the amount of violence in schools. We were also hopeful that students would commit to each other, and not just as pairs. Mentors reported that there was an increase in homophobia among pairs and student pairs didn't stick together. Overall, the number of students who reported bullying incidents did not decrease. We tried to counter some of these issues in a later pilot program, where pairs were matched based on gender, race, gender identity, and sexual orientation. This pilot seemed to yield better results, but the second pilot 0cc13bf012
