a great potential for numerous applications in biomedicine. Normally, the wrinkling properties of PET are exploited in the miniaturization of packing equipment, but the effect of wrinkling is not limited to this field. For instance, the presence of wrinkles enhances the functionality of soft sensors [pone.0108575-Merighi1], the mass of electrochemical microfuel cells can be reduced [pone.0108575-Yadollahpour1]. The presence of wrinkle-like structures can also modify the tissue architecture and improve the efficacy and efficiency of drug-delivery systems. In this context, PET is an excellent candidate for the manufacture of soft microtissues thanks to the compressive forces that are present already in the standard manufacturing process of device substrates. Thus, PET fibers undergo extensive wrinkling when the PET film is simply rolled after it has been processed. Also, because of the rubber-like properties of PET, wrinkles of the PET fibers show a tendency to homogenize after the rolling process if the difference in the dimensions of the wrinkles in different areas is not too large. This ability to readily homogenize could be exploited, for example, to create cell-laden scaffolds. In this case, micro-webs made from PET-fiber-aligned scaffolds would have the property to rapidly release cells, creating a net of interconnected pores where the released cells can establish a cell network. Furthermore, cell-laden PET can be rolled into
