What's new:

Welcome to the 4th Edition 4th Edition section! Over the years, we've tweaked and improved the rules to make 4th Edition feel faster, more action-oriented, and a bit more complex at the same time. If you like more approachable rules, have questions about the new mechanics, or get some ideas about how to get your friends to play your game, this section will help you find answers and share excitement with other fans of Pathfinder. Remember the Rules All 4th Edition rules are living and changing things. To help you understand what they mean, and to make sure you're not seeing the rules differently than our other fans, here's a rundown of the changes we've made: The rules work differently in Pathfinder than other games. Most other games have a Class System with a linear progression from Level 0 to Level X, and Classes Gain Levels by acquiring Knowledge or Class-Specific Points. In Pathfinder, Classes work differently, and the system used to gain levels is called a Class Feature. When you put points into your class feature, you're actually gaining more active abilities called Class Feats. We streamlined a lot of the rules that we wrote. We found that certain classes, especially Druids and Barbarians, were almost always overpowered, so we ditched them and replaced them with new subclasses and option rules. In Pathfinder, we don't use classes; we use archetypes. And any game can play any class or archetype as long as the class/archetype isn't exclusive to Pathfinder. The Birthright rules provide a lot of useful tools that follow the basic core class features and archetypes well. For the most part, we've updated the rules about the game's world to better reflect how the world works. Rules are now more focused on player choice than class or background choices. This means that while a Barbarian may never play a Bard, your players can choose to play a spellcaster wearing leather armor while your other players may play a samurai wearing silk. We've changed the math. Most rules and options have been rewritten. Because of the introduction of your experience point system, we've added 'trusting' to our list of Things You Should Not Do. More details on this are in the FAQ. We updated the races. We listened to players and reworked them to be more similar to the original Pathfinder races, rather than deriving from the Elder Spire Book, or any other books you might have played in 3rd and 3
