Radar-based detection and tracking with reduced resources in a WSN environment is an active research area. Object detection using radar is a difficult problem because detection probability is low. For tracking, complex algorithms must be developed to extract temporal and spatial information from signals. While radar is well suited for rapid and unobstructed detection, it is significantly impaired when used for target tracking, due to the inherent nature of radar signal-to-noise ratios. Radar signature removal techniques have been used in conventional radar systems to enhance the target detection probability. However, they require prior knowledge of the radar signal characteristic. In WSN environments, radar power is typically limited and prior knowledge of the radar signal is not feasible. Hence, target detection and tracking can be improved using non-radar signals. Biometric sensors have the advantage of providing a low resolution image of the target. However, biometric sensors require large computation and energy to capture images, and are unable to detect targets at long range. Moreover, since biometric sensors rely on tracking targets using distance changes, which can result in false alarm, they can not provide reliable tracking. Accordingly, it is desirable to provide a system and method for reducing radar signature and increasing detection and tracking probability, that can be used in WSN environments.

The female mixed dentition: an evaluation of the normative development of mandibular and maxillary cusp shape. The purpose of this study was to identify developmental stages in the mandible and maxilla of a female normal mixed dentition sample. Dissections of hemimandibles from a sample of 27 female normal mixed dentition teeth were performed. The mandibular and maxillary cusp widths were measured at several levels. Discriminant function analysis was used to examine the developmental pattern of the cuspal surface. Growth stages were established according to the ratios of the different cusp width measurements.
