The glycosylation of proteins is known to play a critical role in many biological processes, including cellular interactions, host-pathogen interactions, and immune responses. In this study, we demonstrate the ability of size-exclusion chromatography (SEC) to separate α - and β -glucosylated proteins according to their size in order to determine the extent of branching of oligosaccharides on secreted recombinant proteins. The development and evaluation of a SEC-based method for the analysis of glycan heterogeneity on proteins is reported. Two proteins that produced glycosylation heterogeneity were recombinantly produced with α - or β -glucosylation or both. SEC was used to separate oligosaccharide fractions of these proteins using a standard SEC column, resulting in at least 10 clear α - and β -glucosylated proteins per SEC run.Q: If $A$ is a self-
