those who did not come to their 6-month follow-up appointment and (3) those attending their 4-month antiepileptic drug (AED) review. Data were collected using a short questionnaire (demographic details, adherence behaviour, epilepsy characteristics, reasons for taking/not taking medication, and self-report on the comprehensibility and understanding of AED labels) and a telephone interview. Of the 37 participants, 7 (18%) stated they missed doses of their AED regularly and 12 (32%) missed doses occasionally. The most common reason for missing doses was forgetfulness. Although many patients received AEDs for which adherence was the most important reported side effect, few patients engaged in barrier-preventing behaviours in response to side effects. The results of this investigation point to a complex multi-factorial adherence challenge which is most likely a systems issue. This challenge is compounded by patients' and caregivers' perceptions of epilepsy as a condition that must be 'controlled' with drugs. It is important that healthcare professionals can identify the patient's own adherence barriers, and facilitate the development of behaviours, which will strengthen the relationship and improve adherence.
