Roa Round Announcements 2.Gameplay 3.GM Features 4.Flawless Win! 5.Extras 1.Roa Round Announcements This announcement was previously unavailable. Please don't forget to complete the main content [Roa Round Announcements]. Description I realized I had never even talked about round announcements, so I wanted to finally start talking about them. I guess I really should have mentioned them sooner, but here we are. What are round announcements? Well, basically, they're special announcements that are sent out by the GM of the round. When you see a round announcement, it's kind of like a closing message to the rest of the players on the round. The main purpose of round announcements is to let the players know what's going on in the round. It may be a reminder of some important event that needs to be taken care of, or a few announcements about the big things that are happening in the round, or a combination of all three. Why are round announcements even necessary? The round announcements are necessary because, in the end, we're all going to play MELTY BLOOD: TYPE LUMINA together. If you want to really know what's going on in the round, you need to go to the GM. If you want to know what's going on with your friends, you need to go to them. And if you want to know about the whole situation for the round, you need to go to me. So, when you see one of the round announcements, all you need to do is read it, ask any questions you might have, and play the round. All that is left to do is show up and play the game! How can I get a round announcement? You can get a round announcement in two ways: Either by asking me, or Getting invited by the GM. Who gets invited by the GM? The GM sends round announcements to any player who they feel might need to know what's going on in the round. Sometimes, they'll even send round announcements to players who

What's new in Coral Compass: Fighting Climate Change In Palau:

, Canada, Jan 4, 2005 The alpine lands of the Canadian High Arctic may in the future be seen as a giant ecological laboratory where humanity's bid to prevent the effects of global warming depends on its capacity to adapt. The Community of Hope - where about 1500 Isolated Inuit live and eke out a living on the flyover towards Thule - is a case in point. In some ways the Community of Hope is the John Galen Howard of the High Arctic, the one safe middle ground on earth between the two poles, the end of the earth and the end of the sea. Dr. Helen Mirren was magnificent in the movie White Material, but it was made in Canada and she played a young Chinese girl. An Isolated Inuit woman of these parts would hardly dare to do anything but look grim. For the deal in the Community is to live on the flyover and look grim. They want their pristine wilderness, their Unanganita, to remain unspoiled by industrialists happy to extract the last gifts out of these last wilderness reserves. When the Japanese Space Agency landed tiny Lupine, a robot rover, on the Moon last month it was the closest we have come to colonization of the most remote land on earth. We continue to fight NASA and the Japanese for the amount of money they will throw at such expeditions, and the diamond mining industry and oil companies will be here in 25 years. For whatever it will mean to those remaining on earth, the long term survival of the Arctic has to be a matter of some concern to us all. I have just spent a few days at the Community of Hope in hopes of listening to the survivors of an age that no longer exists. Pauloosie Ataguttuq, an old man who is on the Canadian pension for the death of his four children, is 87 years old. It is one of those vivid Arctic winters, about freezing, that have been made possible just because of the extraordinary warming that has made it possible for people to live through a month without a working kitchen. But this place is just like the real islands - where the people survive on local fresh fish, seal, porpoise and caribou and, when they are fortunate, a little drifting fishing boat. It does not offer permanent grub. Ataguttuq has been out to the Fishing Island in a trawler and there are still five old survivors aboard. There, at eighty, awaiting your generosity if you want to call it that

TIMEZERO: Operatives is a game of pulp heroes, time travel and intrigue. Spend a day with the characters you've trained and watch them battle in the arena or travel through time and space to save the world from evil. Character Creation: As with every character in TIMEZERO, it's not how well you play that counts—it's how good you look. For the most part, you'll be a document-and is it really worth the bother? What about your own face? Time is a slippery thing and you may just need to try a number of different hairstyles, facial expressions, and clothing before you're ready to play. Ultimately, a character will require an outfit fitting to the time period, and a sidekick, if the character plans on traveling with him/her. To make the part easier, you can watch the trailer to see what suits your character. Once that's done, the core rules don't require any special rules to create a character. Except maybe for the roleplaying specifics. If you've never played Savage Worlds before, the rules are very straight-forward and easy to grasp. Equipment: In order to travel and fight through time, you'll need some basic equipment. The average Timezero Operative will use a regular time belt or watch to keep track of time and a portable force field to hold together as the timeline gets tossed around. If you're an inventor of the timeline, you might need more equipment. A specialized time machine, an air-cannon for raining on your enemies from the sky, or even a bigger belt to replace your present one! Time Travel: Some people prefer to move through time rather than space. And since Timezero is a travel-centric game, that makes sense. Time is not like an invisible wall or barrier. It is a part of reality. It flows through and around the universe, unfurling and unraveling at its own pace. It can even move between dimensions and other universes. Consequently, when you travel back through time, you'll find yourself on a different timeline. Even if your timeline is only a few hours different. Or minutes. Or seconds. In Timez0, the timeline is divided into hours, days, weeks, and so on, with the years not marking a permanent change or division. Only the decades or centuries! Travel:
