Dawn Of Fear Features Key:

A game packed with interesting graphic effects.
A memorable and thrilling storyline.

An original soundtrack, about 2.7 Mb of music, and a great soundtrack increase the atmosphere of the game.
5 different comic drawings with funny characters, all inspired and dedicate by the current horror comics.

A great amount of blood.
A very realistic lighting.

A variety of super-cool special effects: The catapult, the tentacles, the animation, the fire and the bullet traces.
A great chance to see realistic effects like bloody pebbles on a car's windshield, or an amazing blinking of eyes.

A well guided storyline.
A few cut scenes for the best effect.

- Special effects: A pretty experienced game programmer, motivated by the current generation of video games, I've developed all the Special Effects by using a custom environment, calling them Actions. Most of the effects are animated, by adding a code within the game using a Script feature, and activated within the part of the game where it can be triggered.
- For the sound of the game, the soundtrack was entirely composed by me during 2006, and inspired by today's extreme metal from the genre Clip-Trigger. This was an extreme challenge for me, as I was quite unsure that I had the requirements to do it, and I was very curious in what conclusions will I reach, and the final result of it. I was amazed that the effects worked well, but it was also a nice surprise when I found that it was already done by somebody else for other games.

I'm not getting scared and don't look like i want to. It was just a few voices talking about something that you can't interact with. william Oct 24, 2012 1 Likes that's annoying. What's new:

Review DRIPPING PUNK SCORE Wow. So this is a bad game, huh? Doom you! You arrived in the town full of vampires, hoping for a place to rest and turn the stringer on the internet, but you've get yourself waylaid by a nasty town full of undead loonies, angry steam punk vamps and child frigging witches! Been in games like this before, where the only way to survive is to slowly knock yourself out with every punch you dish out... and here, now you're put upon a compass. Your task is to travel the map, attending to each town's needs, but you will need to keep yourself healthy, because at any point of using your special powers, you will get a small pool of HP, and if you die, you will die. So in order to find a way to survive, you must check whether the area of town you're at has a gas station, a pharmacy, a doctor, a police station, or the gas station with a pharmacy, a doctor and a police station near. (In a Free For All, you can use any one on the map, not just those which are closest to you.) (Look, I told you this was crappy. Deal with it.) Now. Dawn of Fear makes a sincere attempt at being a comedy vampire story, as you travel along with your brother and your couple of friends. You have super vampire powers and you can freely control the kids walking with you. You can use your bio-chip to forcefully pump blood into anyone's veins, as well as healing yourself with the shards of glass embedded in the ground by the wooden fence alongside the road. The kids run off with happiness, as you're just here to breathe life into their legend and show them that being a vampire is full of death and misery. You're not just some badass vampire, you're a cartoonish and funny superhero! What a nice stereotype, huh? (I'm being serious.) Now, you'll do all kinds of side quests, even learning how to perform oral sex! (Note, the game actually expects you to have played "Vampire Slayer" before in order for this to make sense.) There's a Dog-Dog-Dog statue, that you can use to blow some heads in. (I'd rather not give you any more tips on how to tickle babies, thank you very much.) A stuffed bear wearing a bra
